Had the senate refused to consider any tariff reduction bill the republican party would have fought a defensive campaign from the beginning. The McKinley clique wished the party to take the position that the tariff should be undisturbed. The democratic party would not then have been on the defensive with the Mills bill. They would have been on the offensive showing how our tariff should be revised. This would not be difficult. Our tariff duties ought to be levied almost entirely on manufactured articles which we can make in this country and also on luxuries. Very articles of food pay 31 per cent of our entire customs duties while manufactured articles pay only 20 per cent and luxuries 20 per cent. This is not due to the fact that we import so much more food than other articles. Last year we imported $105,000,000 in foods and $121,000,000 in manufactured articles. The duty on foods is higher than the duty on manufactures. This is bad political economy from a protection or any other point of view. It is arranging the tariff to cost more to live, while it should be arranged to cost less to live and yet at the same time protect our industries.

In a speech at a banquet given by the Loyal Legion commandery, of Illinois, March 6th, 1882, General Sheridan made a speech which was of a personal nature. He was talking to comrades and therefore spoke frankly and freely. It is the recital of a brave man of the events in a brave life. The following quotations will prove interesting.

I came home from among the Indians along the Columbia river in the distant state of Oregon some eight months after the war of the rebellion had culminated, having just been promoted from a first lieutenancy to the rank of captain, and with the love of my country nearest to my heart. I was young, healthy and vigorous, so well hardened by my mountain service that it now seems to me when I look back on what I went through that I must have been almost insensible to fatigue. I became the chief quartermaster and chief commissary of the Army of the Southwest, and carried that army forward until the battle of Pea Ridge. I then returned, as by links which it would be too tedious to dwell upon I found myself at Shiloh three or four days after the famous battle there, when I became the colonel of the Second Michigan cavalry. I had [illegible] as the regiment had never had any of the officers excepting Major Alger and the quartermaster, and everybody else when they brought me the order announcing me as the colonel of the regiment. I was made its colonel the day I joined the regiment, which was after dark, and at 8 a. m. marched with it on the Booneville road and buried the dead in the war of the rebellion at Booneville. An appealing and new command, and I believed I could make the most of it by being an honorable, faithful soldier. I knew no one in authority to help me, and if I had I think I would have preferred to rely on myself and the men and officers I commanded for any future which might come to me. I therefore thought I would make the best colonel I could without looking for anything higher unless I could win it. Success so far attended me that in less than one month I was a brigadier general of volunteers. When I became a brigadier general I thought I would make the best one I could. A division of infantry came to my command in what afterward became the Army of the Cumberland, and that division made me major general before the year was up, December 31, 1862, at Stone river. While in command of this old division, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, and the campaign into east Tennessee ensued, in all of which the division did so well that I was transferred to the Army of the Potomac to command the magnificent cavalry corps of that army. With it I led the advance of Grant's victorious army through the Wilderness and down to Petersburg. Still retaining the command of the cavalry corps, which I did until the end of the war, I was transferred to the valley of the Shenandoah to command the army of that name. For the first battle fought I was made a brigadier general in the regular army, and for the third battle, just one month after ward, I was made major general in the regular army. Events went on and in the spring of 1867, Abandoning my command of the Middle military division of the Army of the Shenandoah I put myself at the head of the cavalry corps and started to join Sherman's army in North Carolina, but, falling to cross my command over the James river on account of [illegible] was ordered to the next best thing and go down to join Grant at Petersburg, and again led the advance of the armies of Gen. Grant in the last campaign against Lee. You all know, comrades, what occurred on that campaign.

My friends, by following my career you will see that the cavalry made me a brigadier general in the volunteer service at Booneville, then the infantry a major general at Stone River. The cavalry and infantry at the battle of Opequon, near Winchester, made me a major general in the regular army and the cavalry and artillery at Cedar Creek, commonly known as the battle of Winchester, made me a major general in the regular army, and it was to me, while in command of cavalry and infantry, that the white flag was presented at Appomattox in token of the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia, commanded by General Lee, the morning of April 9th, 1865. All these promotions and successes came to me and I now say before this community that there is not a scrap of paper which will show that I ever asked for any one of them. They were won for me by the troops I had the honor to command. It has been said of me that I was rash, that I was dashing and reckless. I say in reply that there never was an officer more careful of his troops. I never lost a man without a just equivalent if I could help it. There never was a soldier who was more [illegible] information of the enemy's strength and intentions than I was. I took good care of my men. I encamped them well. I watched their rations and their comfort, and when we fought the enemy I showed the men the confidence of victory from my knowledge of the enemy and my confidence in them. I probably should not speak so much about myself, but it should be remembered that I was the chief quartermaster and the chief commissary of the army of the southwest at the battle of Pea Ridge, a cavalry commander in Mississippi with the army of the Tennessee; an infantry commander in Kentucky and Tennessee with the army of the Cumberland; a cavalry commander in Virginia with the Army of the Potomac, an infantry and cavalry commander in the valley of the Shenandoah; and a cavalry and infantry [illegible] campaign against Lee. The [illegible] matter that I was constantly changing from one arm of the service to another and constantly changing from different [illegible] corps or other with new lines of operations to study and operate on, new men to command who had no acquaintance with me, that I had to overcome the natural jealousies of [illegible] from an infantry officer commanding cavalry.

All my war commissions, comrades, have the date of a battle, except my present one of lieutenant general, which was given for all. Thanking you, gentlemen, for your patience with me in this personal recital, I will now give place to others who can better entertain you.

Englishmen Who Tell the Truth

From the Jacksonville Florida Republican.

Two visiting Englishmen of names E. C. Hyland and A. Mason called at the office of the Republican on Monday to see the editor. While in South Florida, Mr. Hyland remarked, they had become Republican, and were so forcibly impressed with the determined opposition of the papers of free trade that they determined to call in when in Jacksonville and offer their congratulations and [illegible] the paper success.

"But you are Englishmen Mr. Hyland from free trade England, which our American democratic free traders are continually holding up as the most prosperous nation on earth. Now if this is true why are you opposed to free trade and why did you leave prosperous England?"

Said Mr. Hyland: "The people of England are [illegible] the country is [illegible] the people are [illegible] a large [illegible] This factory [illegible] hands [illegible] Hamen [illegible] the employees of the [illegible] latter being the coolest wages paid and the only from [illegible] per week the former [illegible] there. And this is a fair illustration of [illegible] wages all over England. Why there are thousands of people out of employ to-day crying for bread, and the destitution there is appalling. You wonder why so many Englishmen come to America? The answer is, plainly, to escape free trade and consequent beggarly wages. In this country, where you have protection for American industries working people get good wages, which [illegible] the people [illegible] free trade [illegible] people. No, the Englishmen [illegible] but [illegible]
